

RESEARCH BRIEF #6

Marriage Education Helps Couples Even When They Are Close to Divorce

Data from the nation’s largest and most diverse study on the impact of Relationship and Marriage Education (RME) classes show that marital satisfaction improves substantially after participating in RME, a finding with significant ramifications during the high-risk early years of marriage.

With half of all divorces occurring in the first 8 years of marriage¹, there are two distinct periods of steep decline in marital satisfaction within this period: during the first 4 years, and once again, during the second four years of marriage². Thus, researchers at Healthy Relationships California were not surprised to find high levels of marital dissatisfaction among those married less than 8 years who participated in their study of 17,245 Californians taking a RME course. More than half of those married 8 years or less were dissatisfied with their marriage when they entered the RME course.

Results from this study come from participants in Relationship and Marriage Education classes sponsored by Healthy Relationships California and taught by facilitators in a wide variety of venues throughout California. The RME curricula are skills-based courses, generally 8-16 hours in length, and generally with a focus on Communication and Conflict Resolution skills. The participants in this report represent a subsample of participants who were married up to 8 years and reported on their marital satisfaction before the course and after the course (n = 483).

After participating in RME for 8 to 16 hours, researchers found a 42% increase in the number of participants who were satisfied with their marriage. Importantly, 55% of participants married 4 years or less who had been moderately distressed before the course reported being satisfied with their marriage immediately after the course. Thirty days after the course, 56% of those moderately distressed before the course were satisfied with their relationship, and nearly half of the formerly moderately distressed remained satisfied 6 months after participating in Marriage Education.

Impact of RME on Satisfaction of Moderately Distressed Married Participants in First 4 Years of Marriage

After participating in a Relationship and Marriage Education course, the majority of moderately distressed participants married 4-8 years reported being satisfied with their marriage, an increase of 35%. More than 63% of those married 4-8 years and who had been moderately distressed before the course were satisfied in their relationship 30 days after the course, and most notably, the satisfaction remained high for 52% of previously moderately distressed individuals 6 months after participating in RME.

Impact of RME on Satisfaction of Moderately Distressed Participants Married 4 to 8 Years

Even those participants who were the most distressed about their marriage before the RME course made substantial gains in satisfaction by the end of the course. Of those who were married less than 4 years and who were highly distressed before the course, one-quarter reported being satisfied with their marriage at the end of the course. These participants maintained this increased level of satisfaction 30 days after the course (rising to 33% who were satisfied), and also at 6 months after participating in RME when more than half (54%) of the previously highly distressed participants were now satisfied with their marriage.

Impact of RME on Satisfaction in Highly Distressed Married Participants in First 4 Years of Marriage

For participants who were in the high-divorce-risk stage of 4-8 years of marriage and who entered the RME course with high levels of marital distress, nearly one-quarter of these had become satisfied with their relationship immediately after participating in RME, and this group grew to 31% after thirty days. Most importantly, 6 months after participating in RME, nearly one-half (47%) of these formerly highly distressed individuals were satisfied with their marriages.

Effects of RME for Distressed Couples in the Early Years of Marriage

This research is particularly noteworthy as it demonstrates the potential of RME to increase marital satisfaction at a time when marriages have been found to be most vulnerable. Although divorce is most likely to happen in the first 8 years of marriage, about half of participants from this high-divorce-risk cohort who were distressed in their relationship before taking a Relationship and Marriage Education course had become satisfied with their marriage after participating in a relatively brief RME course. This result held both for participants who were moderately distressed and for those who had been highly distressed before the RME course, and the positive trend lines after RME were either maintained or increased over time. As a result, this study adds evidence to the value of Relationship and Marriage Education not only for couples wishing to enhance a solid marriage but also for those whose marriage is foundering.

These results are considered both significant and important for several reasons:

1. Because research shows that divorce is most common in the first 8 years of marriage, these results demonstrate how RME can be effective in reducing marital distress during this critical period of time. This result lends credibility to the potential of Marriage Education as a potent means for reducing the incidence of divorce for couples during their critical first 8 years of marriage.

2. The majority of individuals who improved their relationships after participating in RME were able to maintain the positive changes in their relationships for at least 6 months.

3. As the RME classes evaluated in this study are relatively short, ranging from 8 to 24 hours in length, they present many couples with a means for improving their relationship that can occur over just one or two weekends.

4. As the cost of RME classes is significantly lower than marital therapy, RME presents couples with a relatively inexpensive investment for increasing marital satisfaction, and represents as well a promising and cost-effective means for funders looking to invest in family health and well-being, outcomes that also benefit a wide range of other social factors that are linked to marital outcomes.
